

The letter "q" is almost always followed by "u," as in words like queen, earthquake and equity. When used in this way, the "u" is not considered to be a vowel.

R1

U Always Follows Q

A number of words are pronounced with an /s/ sound after the letter "x," which often leads to spelling mistakes.

The rule is that the letter "s" never follows "x" in a word. Instead, the letter "c" is used to achieve the /s/ sound in the word, as is the case with words like excise and excite.

R2

S Never Follows X

Every syllable of every word includes at least one vowel. Most one-syllable words with a short vowel sound need only one vowel. When you're spelling a word, say it out loud to identify the number of syllables. Then, look at what you've written to verify that each syllable has at least one vowel.

R3

Every Syllable
Includes a Vowel

Words that include an "i" and "e" side-by-side, the "i" comes first. Words include niece, belief, cashier and achieve. Unless the vowel pair follows the letter "c" (such as with conceit, ceiling), or if the vowel pair makes a long /a/ sound, such as in neighbor or weigh. However, there are quite a few special-case exceptions, like leisure, height and heist.

R4

I Before E Except
After C

For words that end with a /k/ sound, you'll need to know when to use "ck" vs. just a "k" on its own. The rule is to use "ck" immediately after a short vowel, such as with duck, sick, or tick. Otherwise, the word should end with a "k," as with silk, balk, beak, or peak

R5

Use -ck After a Short
Vowel

If the letters "f" or "l" fall at the end of a one-syllable word, they should usually be doubled. Examples include words like stiff and stall. The only exception is words that end with a consonant blend, such as whirl or wharf. Do not double "f" or "l" with such terms.

R6

End 1-Syllable Word
With Double F/ L

An apostrophe should be placed in the exact spot where there is a missing letter (or multiple missing letters). For example, the apostrophe in the word "can't" signifies the missing letters "n" and "o" from the word cannot.

There are no commonly used words that end with the letter "v" or "j." If you're spelling a word that ends with a /v/ sound, you can be sure that there's a silent "e" on the end, as with hive or jive.

Words that end with a /j/ sound are typically spelled with -dge at the end, such as judge or edge.

R8

Do Not End a Word
With V or J
